By his front door,
Wukong had a sunny spot.
"Let's grow tiny tomatoes!"

Ao Bing brought two plants.
They dug two little holes.
"One for you. One for me!"

They shared sweet tomato bites.
"We grew these," said Wukong.
Ao Bing smiled. "Together."

They washed their little harvest.
Red tomatoes. Cool water.
"Now we can taste them!"

In went the plants.
Pat, pat went the soil.
Wukong patted his tummy, too.

Wukong tipped his little can.
"A drink for you..."
Oops! A drink for his shoe!

Twist, lift, plop.
They picked the red ones.
The green ones stayed to grow.

One morning... red!
Bright, shiny, tomato red!
Wukong did a tiny tomato dance.

Ao Bing made a tiny cloud. Drip, drip, drip. "Gentle rain!" said Wukong.

Each day, they checked the soil.
Dry? A little drink.
Damp? Time to play!

They watered. They waited.
Green turned to gold.
Gold turned to orange.
"Almost!"

Wukong whispered, "Please turn red." The tomatoes said nothing. Not even a peep.

"Red yet?" asked Wukong. He peeked under every leaf. Ao Bing found his tickly nose.

Days went by.
Little yellow flowers opened.
"Hello, tiny stars!"

Then came tiny green tomatoes.
"Ready?" asked Wukong.
"Not yet," said Ao Bing.
